Democracy Dies in Darkness

WASHINGTON POST IN 2011

The Post in 2011 came with a rich legacy of incredible journalism and political reporting — but our aspirations were often confined in DC and old ways of delivering news.

Bringing transparency to the forefront

The Transparency Project

Fighting fake news

We're working with the Google Trust Project to improve media literacy in the general public—to clarify the difference between responsible journalism and fake news. The Post has been at the forefront of this effort. Our work is defining best practices for other newsrooms to follow.

MEASURING RESULTS, BUT NOT THE PROCESS

Our metrics are backward looking — they tell us how many visitors came to our site, what they read and how they engaged — but they don't give us information in immediately influence the result.

- At the Post:
 - We publish ~ 450 original, staff-written articles daily
 - Publishing process has at least 3 touchpoints, and for breaking news articles often more than a dozen
 - Lots of data on author, desk, story type, story metadata
 - Typically between 25 – 50 FE code deploys daily
 - Data about past performance of similar articles that we can compare in real time
- What does this mean? How many stories per day do you publish?

NEW FRAMING: LEAD VS. LAG MEASURES

LAG MEASURES

- Backward-looking
- Measure past-performance
- Useful for deep analysis of trends
- Requires domain experience to understand how to act on that analysis
- Examples: Omniture/Google Analytics metrics (PVs, engagement, ad viewability), funnel analysis

LEAD MEASURES

- Real-time; within the measurement period
- Provides insight that allows your business to take action before the specific opportunity is over
- Use these metrics to immediately take action and change the result
- Examples: what stories will publish late? Which stories will go viral? Which front-end deployments are negatively impacting the performance budget? How is a user interacting with my site right now? How is a particular funnel cohort behaving?
